

RPRD 802 Financial Institution Theory and Practice
Draft: September, 2018

Fall 2018

Frank Milne

Overview:

This course provides an overview of the banking, insurance and financial institution literature which has attempted to understand the recent financial crisis. The post crisis literature is voluminous and of varied quality. It is easy to become confused by the plethora of arguments, models and evidence covered in the large number of articles, reports and books. Any such course must be very selective and requires judgment in selecting what is important, especially given the time constraints of a one semester course. I have included good recent survey papers or books on important areas, so that the student can explore topics in greater depth. As our understanding of various aspects of the crisis is evolving, the good student should read the surveys to understand the depth and subtlety of some of the issues.

To understand the essential issues, we will spend the first half of the course exploring key ideas from the microeconomics of banking, insurance and financial institutions that is surveyed in the graduate text, Freixas and Rochet, the insightful monograph by Shin, the banking surveys in Berger, Molyneaux and Wilson, Thakor and Boot, and the shrewd observations on insurance by Plantin and Rochet. Without this background, the recent literature can be understood only at a superficial level. Much of the recent, careful analysis builds on theory and empirical observation from this earlier literature.

The second half of the course surveys key articles and books attempting to understand the causes and implications for the real and financial sectors. As our understanding evolves through research, various mechanisms and events can be viewed in different ways, highlighting various incentives, market reactions, etc.

This course complements the Risk Management Theory and Applications RPR 801 course in providing an overview of how the banking and financial intermediation industry is embedded in a market system. Therefore, it provides a solid foundation for analyzing systemic risks, a risk that lies outside the traditional analysis of financial risk management.

The Financial Regulation RPR 803 course draws on the Financial Institutions literature to address market failures and regulatory responses.

Basic Texts:

Freixas and Rochet, Microeconomics of Banking. MIT Press (Second Edition) 2008.

Shin, Risk and Liquidity Oxford University Press 2010.

Assessment: There are three components:

- 1. 30% For a Midterm exam.
- 2. 30% class presentation/lecture in the second half of the term on one topic on the reading list.
- 3. 40% Final Examination.

A. Pre-Crisis Analysis of Banking, Finance and Insurance:

Contrary to popular discussion, long before the 2007-9 crisis, there existed a voluminous literature that explored the various functions of financial institutions, their interaction with the real economy and financial crises. For a deep understanding of the history, evolution and characteristics of financial intermediation and systemic financial risks, the basics of this literature are essential.

Topics:

1. Structure of the US and Canadian Financial Systems:

Greenbaum, Thakor and Boot (2016) Ch.2
